I Must Want it. No, I Must Need It.

by Carl Santoro

I convinced myself, as I lay here among the luxurious folds of my morning bedsheets, that I was inhaling the enticing aroma of freshly brewing coffee.

It's not true, of course. I am the only soul inhabiting this little cape on the bay.

The open window above my head escorts in the mellifluous conversational notes being exchanged among the birds of my backyard forest, birds eager to tell each other of their whereabouts this new day.

The cat knows it is 5 a.m. as it does every morning. She rubs her head into mine on her way to the window sill. Curiosity.

I get up.

I make coffee.