Mirrors/srorriM

by Darryl Price

It's weird to be here. I wonder if you are here too. You'd probably say oh that was years ago. And you would be right. But I like the things we believed in then. Some of them I still do. You're old I guess. You were so pretty and golden in your new bathing suit. And I was too skinny from smoking too much and eating too little. But I was always up for writing you another lovesong. I don't know if we had troubled minds. We had aching hearts. And there didn't seem to be much relief for that.

But still we laughed a lot. And we knew how to take care of each other. That's something.

I don't like to hear the people calling other people monsters. It makes me think of broken mirrors. Trees full of them. Stars flashing them like knives. Windows on houses where no one has seen a living face in years. It's weird to be here, incapable of talking with you without missing the smallest things, except through a bunch of typed out words on a computer screen. I used to love my typewriter. The way it pressed each letter deep into the paper's dough, the crowded sentences starting to line up like chattering concert goers with thrills and unknown expectations in their eyes. We held hands once and it seemed like the only safe thing that made any real sense to me in the world. Now I'm like one of those guys walking alone on the beach, no big dog, no favorite frisbee, just a goofy fishing hat and some sunglasses. Not wanting to know what time it is, but being able to tell any way by the color of the sand and sea. You learn a few solid things and try to forget everything else. It's weird to be here. I'm still me. I wonder if you're still you. The

you that was the most beautiful person in the room of beautiful people. I liked looking for you. And I liked finding you. It's weird to be here. Now is such a far away place to be. And here isn't much better. I wanted to say that I'm sorry, but I don't know what for. We had dreams that came and asked us to get into different cars. I didn't want you to go with them. I didn't trust them, but I trusted you. It's weird to be here. The world is still as cruel as a snake. It hasn't gotten any kinder. I hope it has been kind to you. Weird. But not so wrong I suppose. You knew how to smile. Everyone said so. I admired that about you. My crookedly round face could only try to almost get it right, feeling mostly out of place in every place, except when I was anywhere with you. Not so much a miracle, let them say, but we know, it was our little secret. It's weird. I made it into the poetry papers, but you're not here to read them. It's weird to be here. It's not where I thought I'd be. It's a rotten town everywhere you go. But I wouldn't call it a wasted life. We just didn't know it would call us to leave each other forever to the other side of the moon. But I look up and I smile.

Bonus poem:

Goodbye Bees by Darryl Price(first unrevised draft)

Try to understand. There were real dragons. Some were friendly, but they were fire-breathing dragons after all. You didn't want to end up standing on the wrong side of a spilled belch. Try to understand. The barefoot woman standing in the grass just outside her garden gate was perfect for the sun, perfect for any wind. Her hair was like a noble flag calling you to enlist your heart into something more caring than corrupt. Like a grand slam to the side of the head. Bees barely noticed. Birds typed the words you felt, above her unenlisted head, high in the clouds, with their sing-song beaks on full tattletale throttle. Try to understand. We were just boys. We had barely thought more deeply about what we were doing than seeing the invitation. Only the adventure itself ever took us farther away from our own skins. Down the stairs. Down the road. Suddenly we were holding on for dear life. Trying to understand frustration. This was something new. And hurt in ways no gun could ever hope to protect us from. Bees elbowed their way past our frozen stampede like we were made of flimsy daisy chains. Try to understand. We were watching paintings coming to life. Try. We were the lovers of love. Our hands and faces were for us, only for each other to see. Bees buzzed around everyone's heads. The barefoot woman moved into a beautiful house and stayed behind its white picket windows forever. We were young dreamers breathing in space together. You blew my mind. Is this the place we made a secret plan to always appreciate the bees? The heart breaks. It's a crime. No one claims to have seen anything. The heart breaks. No one understands. No one comes. Our hands. Our faces. Our bees. I got on my tiger. What else was I going to do? He is now my only true friend. Good company though.