

The Truth About Storytelling

by Ed Higgins

“Human beings need to organize the inchoate sensations amid which we pass our days-pain, desire, pleasure, fear-into a story.” -- Andrew Delbanco

irretrievably we tell ourselves stories irretrievably as beaded water slides off our skin irretrievably even as it makes our skin crawl irretrievably if we make teeth-gnashing truth irretrievably hope is a tightened heart noose irretrievably we die, our beloveds will die as well, sometimes before irretrievably aging, aging: often little wiser irretrievably the purple wall of clematis drops its flowers irretrievably some days Beelzebub shits flies in your coffee irretrievably Agamemnon is splattered with Iphigenia's gore irretrievably Clytemnestra prepares a bath for returning Agamemnon

irretrievably our house plants die from lack-of or over-watering irretrievably St. George cannot kill those venom-dragons in his head

irretrievably we think we do our best—irretrievably, we usually do not irretrievably we fall into black totalities of meaninglessness irretrievably we will fuck things up even more, more irretrievably: without the telling of story we are irretrievably lost
