After Appomattox

by Gary Hardaway

The Confederates should have hung from trees and gallows throughout the south to celebrate the spring of 1865.

The renegade states- Virginia, Georgia, Texas, and the rest- should have lost their names and been reconstrued as fresh new territories. The lands the hung once held by deed should have been reclaimed as public lands and granted to the aboriginals and slaves the worst of the Dutch and English deprived of land and liberty. As a son of the south, I would never have been born- a small price to pay in order not to suffer an endless loathing of personal history.
