An Indirection

by Gary Hardaway

The bones are chilled now, past invigorations of the coming spring and its entanglements of roots and tendrils, leaves, and the flagrancies of petals and pollen.

Deformations of the frost have left the hard tubes scarred beyond recoveries of warm rain and fragrant air.

Too numerous now, the fine fissures of the freeze and thaw of decades.

The filigree of stress leaves the framework too fragile to move.
