Morning and Coffee

by Gary Hardaway

He is tired in his bones as if the chronic tug of gravity has bent each one into catenary misalignment. Muscles balk at moving such a bent, resistant burden.

A dirtied light falls through the grimed windowpanes. Are the aroma and flavor of coffee worth the struggle of getting up? For another day, the appetite prevails and the not quite dead weight rises.