Of Roses and Hyacinths

by Gary Hardaway

The blooms are practical and cannot see themselves as beautiful or smell themselves as fragrant.

Beauty is an imposition draped across the parts we sense

(with limiting apparatus) of all the worlds that spread, oblivious.