Phenomenology as Snapshots

by Gary Hardaway

The fluffed-up clouds, darkish in spots, are moving fast, opposite the wind where I stand and look. Equations could describe the multiplicities of this but by the time they were written the sky would be moving, invisibly, uniformly gray, and dropping large, soft snowflakes. To pen the world, one must pin it as if a thing so fluid, fierce, and independent of the writer can ever be truthfully penned.
