The Bird Nests of Lascaux

by Jerry Ratch

With their brightly-colored bits of found string woven into the walls of their nests to teach their baby birds what the worms of the future will look like.

Somewhat like the cave paintings of Lascaux for early man in France, when hunting was still necessary for survival, before wine, before make-up, and fashion, and the invention of the demitasse.

The life at the café, the boulangerie, the vaunted leg in the high-heel shoe.

Their brightly colored feathers all flustered.
