falling

by Kitty Boots

it is the witchy season when trees reluctantly give up their leaves the moon becomes more important as it stimulates dreams, calls for caution mine are always in color, vibrant, alive

I arrange my stones in circles bury a spirit cache under the hearth leave no trace of hair in my brush or fingernail clippings wear muddy-colored clothes the neon of summer is too tempting in it's brilliance and I no longer have the protection of the sun, except for my tattoo the call of the Great Horned Owl is unsettling but, I can't control the change as I watch others glean from the harvest