In tidal relief

by Sara Fitzpatrick Comito elixir of desiccation, seawater frays the thin layers of lips offered prostrate to a jealous sun like jellyfish spoiled to a soup on hot jetties peeled off indelicately, raining down as powdered glass out of quarreling beaks the world slips under the waves we ignore the loss: our green pedestal darkens and the horizon curves dizzyingly for our floating berating as the fence quakes with native urchins who scatter in the practiced nightstick wave let the sand cram no more infant folds, crown my flimsy land-ankles in vagrant algae grasp my knees with tendrils bear up my webbings and lick my hollow ears fill my caverns and make me a tomb of fishes
