

traffic incident

by Anthony M. Powers

driving home from work at 8 a.m.
and i haven't slept in three days.
it's starting to feel like i never really slept at all in the first place.
a red light stops me cold and as i ash my cigarette through the driver's side window the little burnt bits of paper fly back at me.
one piece
that was still burning bright orange
lands in my eye
and i start
screaming.
i check the damage in my rearview mirror
but there's nothing.
but i see there's some sort of SVU behind me,
the kind that only people with money
or people
with no money
drive.
this one has money.
behind the wheel is a serious looking man, clip on tie, bright gold watch just barely glimmering
in the gray morning dawn,

Available online at «<http://fictionaut.com/stories/anthony-m-powers/traffic-incident>»

Copyright © 2010 Anthony M. Powers. All rights reserved.

talking on his cell phone. in my head i hear him trying to explain to his wife why he missed his son's birthday party the night before, he was working late,
and why he has to go on a last minute business trip and maybe why
he's been fucking his secretary because he doesn't love her anymore. he starts picking his nose with his free hand.
i don't see him flick or wipe.
he must see me looking and he wipes his face and scratches his nose
just like everybody does when they get caught.
the light turns green and a song that reminds me of the past and a girl starts playing on the radio.
i start to cry.
i tell myself it's because i haven't slept in three days.
i take side streets
the rest of the way.

