Burying the Hatchet

by Bill Yarrow

I wanted the pain to go away, so I let them stick me. No luck. I still feel rotten, and now my head, deliciously empty for decades, is clogged with thoughts of dying. I'm doomed. I'm a goner. Forget it. I'm riding the rails of deterioration. I know it. Soon I will be boneless. and alone. But I am not alone. Not yet. In the other room, my mother is wrestling a mongoose. Between rounds, she sits on a radio instead of a chair. I can't guite hear what is playing, so I say, "Turn it up. Turn it up." A fireman holding an ice pick adjusts the volume. The Chemical Brothers appear on the Jumbotron. Australia secedes from the U.N.
