Liking in "The Scarlet Letter"

by Bill Yarrow like a flame that sinks down among the late decaying embers like a floating sea-bird on the long heaves and swells of sound like the phantasmagoric play of the northern lights like an uprooted weed that lies wilting in the sun like a black shadow emerging into sunshine like ether out of a phial like a tuft of green moss on a crumbling wall like a rough blow upon an ulcerated wound like the stroke of sudden death like the dome of an immense lamp like blades of grass at the sweep of the scythe like a line of cliffs against a tempestuous tide like a shapeless piece of driftwood tossed ashore with the initials of a name upon it like the voice of a young child that was spending its infancy without playfulness like a ghost that revisits the familiar fireside and can no longer make itself seen or felt like a man taken by surprise in a mood to which he was reluctant to have witnesses like a glimmering light that comes we know not whence and goes we know not whither like the first encounter in the world beyond the grave of two spirits who had been intimately connected in their former life but now stood coldly shuddering in mutual dread as not yet familiar with their state nor wonted to the companionship of disembodied beings like the convulsive throes of the cholera like the frozen calmness of a dead woman's features like one awakening, all nerveless, from an ugly dream like a young deer like fading sunshine like a red flame in the dark like truth like a dream like human language
