Speaking to the Dead

by Bill Yarrow

I didn't hear your last words or see your last eyes. I didn't reach you in time, so I sat by your corpse, silently saying goodbye. I am in that process, not sour, not sweet, that yoked speaking which can't (because the heart won't let it) utter its whispered last word, but stutters instead like the awful-eyed idiot of love, stroking a hand and thinking it speech. Nothing pulses now from your cold, dead palm; No sounds exit, no language leaks.

You're beyond the infinite weakness of words; I'm still in their thrall, caught in the thrashing eloquence of unregistered inarticulate emotion.

What does death do? It petrifies pain, reifies loss, installs nothing new, revokes everything old.
