I Laughed at the Ants

by Carl Santoro

I'm moving to the beat of an internal drum.

I cross paths with those moving to different beats every second of every day.

Fakirs and whirling dervishes, priests, nuns, gurus, salespeople telling me where, how and when to move to their beats.

I bounce around, brushing into molecules. All with their own beats and destinations.

I go, I come back.

I go there again.

It's good to be sane holding dear a plan of utter lifelong distractions.

It IS good, right?

"Don't step on the ants!" someone shouts.

I freeze my stride. Look down.

There they are.

There WE are.

...and I laughed at the ants.