

Spatter

by Charlotte Hamrick

Your mouth spews forth verbiage like a hacksaw tearing through ancient pulp.
Sonofabitch's and goddammit's fly through the air swift as buckshot, slamming into the wall like so many bits of lubricious life force, cracking like eggshells pecked by thieving crows.

Your zealous display detonates as red bursting veins and eyeballs popping, provoking frosted looks in the urbane and wide eyes of panic in the timorous. You are oblivious to the stir you've created, being so into your life is drama/drama is life - not that you'd care anyway. As for me, well, restraint has never held any fascination for me.

