

Songlines

by Collin Kelley

When the planes crashed, when the levees broke,
when the ground shook,
there was a song I dreamed of,
humming subsonic,
a chorus of voices and prayers uncorked like the little brown jug that holds all the love and memories.

In the outback, Aborigines believe we create the world by our actions, that our past and futures are connected in Dreamtime, in songlines.
Your story and my story intersect on a long, thin line of sound and vision, every story.

Some great godhead speaks in one voice, but after creation he disappears into The Dreaming — call him Mura-mura, Muhammad, Buddha or Christ.
We are charged to pick up the trail, find the spirit, the sacredness of the earth.

We live in a world of noise, the human symphony drowning us out, until we are drawn together in crisis.
When the troubles come, when resistance will be necessary, raise your aerials, pull the songlines out of the air, so that our collective voices find the melody again.

So we are forever singing the world into existence and out of darkness.
