

Table for One

by Daniel Passamaneck

He scrapes at the formica with his thumb. He'd rather be nearer a wall. He wishes he didn't look every time somebody comes in. He keeps re-reading the menu but knows already how it ends. The cutlery and empty glass across from him, accusatory, pitying, have killed his appetite. For food.

