

Cassandra Folds My Poem in Her Hand and Loses Her Heart in the Process

by Darryl Price

Ours is but the very small effort being made here.
But it's a good enough keeper for all of us to always remember off. All the tins that aren't really going to save us from starving, now are neatly arranged all around, just in case, stacked according to their rightful places in the beautiful candle lit mystery of life's jumping car seat. All we can do is mirror the unexplained pangs of so much wintry thought in our empty heads, then abiding joy in our own sudden awakenings within. It's like us, waving from boxes, like little mechanical maniacs, only from a much more aesthetic window frame. It's like saying here I made this tiny funny thing to get to know you somewhat better but I guess it doesn't turn anything over--not unless everything everywhere also means something other than this terrible life we're still having to tote around. That's the pretty some of us continue to wear above our thorny crowns. It's to show that we always believe there's an answer going on somewhere in the conversation, so we'll keep our cool dreams in the front ends of our warm pockets with the broken seashells and all the old pennies. I dearly love all the well spent pennies! They've seen so much already, you know, and traveled such far distances. Let's go inside together, inward I mean, I hear it's an amazing party, still happening over there, hey, at least it's free.

We should dance. Oh I love this mad mad mad sound that only comes out like this whenever we're alone together. I suppose I shall cry into your arms some day. But. But but. That won't be the real me, being all the way into the music's embrace anymore, will it though, and that's just plain weird to me now. But for now we're all us-- gathered inside the story's borders, like scribbled notes on envelopes, just say okay? That's not a question, it's a response to too many words pouring up and over my head's sloppy rim. Too much you in my heart. Too much myself as well.

To the awful drying air in here that's squeezing my throat shut with an elephant for a handkerchief. I do want to cry right now, if you don't mind that is,
I do. I can feel just like it right this very minute. But (I swear) I don't want you to look at me.
If you look I'll only seem silly, like I'm trying to pee in an unfamiliar forest.

How a Poet Puts on His Pants

The beautiful thing easily entered his brains this morning, just like a live radio with a timer on its otherwise smooth forehead goes green and then bingo you're further awake somehow than your dreams let on, just as he was about to exit the bathroom of all places. Typical, he thought, of these kinds of Faery giftgivers. They like to catch you off-balance, maybe a little more relaxed than usual, say, less unencumbered with today's suits of armor than yesterday's. Still nothing in the universe is free. The theft of this barter had already been made to lower the scales on one side. It was up to him to figure out the exact price-- probably at the same time it was to be extracted, be it a fall or a shove, a nudge or a wink, like a too loose tooth. Something had already been given, and someone would most likely have to give something back, or else. Isn't that how these things usually get the goat? Hey, he wasn't feeling particularly ungrateful this morning but taken by surprise. He knew he could feel it, he could, right then and there, with a birdsong like that stuck on repeat, whirling around in his reopened head, sing something quite wonderful if he would only choose the moment that chose him, but also knew there must come a time to let go of its wing and plunge back down into a numb empty nest inside the hollowed out crook.

Hello and Welcome to your very own poem from me. Well you did indeed find me and hey look I'm not even all the way dead yet. So good job. This is that only moment we were ever meant to have together. This one. But I'm afraid I have no wisdom to impart to you for your persistence in tracking me down. There.

I've said it. You didn't miss it already did you? I'm just a sad and lonely old poet living off his words in a cold cold cave of a world and waiting for you yes you to show up for God knows what earthly reasons other than to say you did it. Yep I'm just real glad you made that last ditch effort to climb up all those rocks in my head. Thanks.

Ah I suppose you'll be wanting the cup from me anyway but it's not mine to give you just because you're willing to take it.Oops. I may have just let slip a little sack of the cosmic goop there. Oh what the heck. You've earned it,baby.So go ahead. Steal away.What good's a heart for the mortally wounded any old way when you look at it like that?
