

Falling Rocks in Equal Doses

by Darryl Price

Not sure I remember what's important, but I remember you.
That's the whole problem I think. You're a drain where all my words wind up going down. All of them get lost inside of you. Eventually. And I'm left with nothing to say. Because all my words are gone like toothpaste.
The few I've got left only seem to repeat themselves in pathetic smears. But they'll have to do. Not sure I can remember anything important, but I say your name in my sleep. It's all become a boring animal ritual.
I can admit to that. I remember you used to wear this yellow teeshirt all the time like it defined something impossible about you and your motion inside dark jeans.

It drove me mad with desire. And that made you laugh. Which drove me over a cliff, into an ocean, and left me clinging to slippery rocks for dear life.
So not sure I remember one important thing about anything if you want to know the truth. But I know the song that made you sit still and look at things like they were puzzles you were putting together in your head as a little seductive dance. How else am

I going to describe the sadness back to you now?
When you're not even listening. And my readers are expecting me to swing this crazy thing around and show them the secret room inside of themselves. But a broken heart can only make cubist desk paintings out of its overly hoarded toy stuffs and hope for the best. I can't remember what's important to me any more. It was so clear to me just yesterday. Oh. Open my eyes. Let me see a way. Let me swim before I drown.

Let me swim before I wash away. I remember you as important but I can't seem to remember why. The words won't tell me. I'm not sure they think we deserve to know the answer. Or they just might be trying to protect us from the tilting sun. Oh. It's too late for that. Oh, open my head. Let me see before I go completely blind from all the salt in my own eyes. Running down my face. For all of us who are left have my words fight for air. For all of us here let my words continue to look for fair meaning. And kiss you goodbye. For all the lonely floating pieces let my wrecked words shine through the slumber of time and ruin. Night and day. Open the curtains. I remember you. You were the question I guess I needed to hear from this life. Thank you for asking me. It was a beautiful way to say hello and a hard way to say goodbye as the next question on the horizon became more solitary in its insistence on authenticity. Maybe what was so important doesn't matter. But it remains with me. And I wouldn't want you to think of it in any other way than real love.

Bonus poems:

Invisible Sky
by Darryl Price

This is the nothing you called for. I don't know why you should want it delivered from me. My light went out. You might as well go on and receive it from any passing glass. Once at least it would have seemed a small breeze and a faint perfume and a quiet shaking of some early summerlike leaves. Now you can call it a drowning ocean or an invisible sky if you want to but it doesn't hold up anything recognizable. My open hands are empty.

All around my world the loveliness is sunk from my voice. My light is smashed and in pieces. The waiting is all over now. You should really walk away into some nearest bright tavern and celebrate. Here. Have one on me. My light was mortally hurt from the beginning.
If you've found salvation on your path you are blessed among so few fish out of water survivors. I'm bound for the elephant graveyards myself.

I've heard they accept poets there without question. My light was strange. You said so yourself somewhere inside the dark.
This is the nothing. I am the unremembered sky you once danced beneath. This is the nothing you called for. My heart broke around you, that's all. A fool for love is always a lost soul. Everyone knows that. I learned it on my knees.

My Tiger by Darryl Price

Try to understand. There were dragons. Some were friendly, but they were real dragons. You didn't want to end up standing on the wrong side of a belch. Try to.

The young barefoot woman standing in the grass just outside her garden gate was perfect for the sun, perfect for any wind. Her hair was like a flag calling you to enlist your heart into something more noble. Like a grand slam to the side of the head. Bees barely noticed. Birds typed the words you felt, above her head, high in the clouds, with their sing-song beaks on full tattletale throttle. Try to understand. We were boys. We had never thought more deeply about what we were doing than the invitation. Only the adventure itself ever took us farther away. Down the stairs. Down the road. Suddenly we were holding on for dear life. Trying to understand frustration. This was something new. And hurt in ways no gun could ever hope to protect us from. Bees elbowed their way past our frozen stampede like we were made of daisy chains. Try to understand. We were watching paintings come to life. Try. We were lovers. Our hands and faces were for us, only for each other. Bees buzzed around everyone's heads. The barefoot woman moved into a beautiful house and stayed behind its white picket windows forever. We were new dreamers breathing together. You blew my mind. Is this the place we made a secret plan to always appreciate the bees? The heart breaks. It's a crime. No one claims to have seen anything. The heart breaks. No one understands. No one comes. Our hands. Our faces. Our bees.

I got on my tiger. What else was I going to do? Now he is my only friend. Good company.

Talking to a Locked Gate by Darryl Price

"Fun is the one thing that money can't buy."--The Beatles

Poetry is an act of love. Who do you think you are? I'm not on your wave, you riders of young dreaming lovers, their hands tied together in brave hope for the future. An act of love. Who are you?

I am not on your side, you armies of trial and terror, you proud puppets, stompers of desire and exploration, mistakes and spontaneity.
Poetry is my love for you. I am not on your path, you critics of the imperfect fumble, artists trying to score lightning into magic.

I resist. You gender deniers of the great mysterious spirit in nature. Poetry is an act of my love.

I return your beauty, manipulators of precise political correctness, the strict lanes of bricked-up feeling, spit while proclaiming freedom for only your own pain.

Poetry is at the heart of all life, a wild sensuality I celebrate like a priest, diverse and giving. Who do you think you are? I'm on the side of dancers, starry-eyed rain makers.

Poetry is an act
of fun. Silly has no religion. It has no government. It is not precious. It is our friend.
Do you think you are sane?
I'm on the side of shells of the beach, light that shines.

