I Liked My Giant Friends

by Darryl Price

When you say they were too big, too wild, they weren't too big to be giants.

Giants are meant to dwarf things. They can't help it. They're not trying to make you feel helpless to give them a haircut. They just grow fast. But they have sorrows you can't understand. They meet the storms first head on. They stand in the way of lightning and hail. They take a beating before you even know it is snowing or raining. They looked pretty happy to me, even with their large lot in life. They made me feel safe. And now they are gone, and like so many other instances of gone, without goodbyes or hugs inside the dreamy brain. The only mourning that can take place is without them, like an empty bowl of fruit, they are eaten away. There is nothing left but a story of once there were giants but now there are none. Just dark patches of dirt.

Just extra light. An empty little forest and not much to tell. The tree looks confused.

The street lamp acts ashamed. Birds have lost a map. Perhaps this is progress. They can make you appear to have never existed. Can flatten the earth where you once stood. They can erase your presence. They can make you feel something else because there's nothing else to feel. And that is the end of that. Amen, and don't forget to brush your teeth.

Available online at $\mbox{\it whttp://fictionaut.com/stories/darryl-price/i-liked-my-giant-friends>}$

Copyright © 2013 Darryl Price. All rights reserved.

Might as well look good as the dust becomes your only words. Goodbye, my lovely giants.

12:44 AM Saturday, June 15, 2013 Darryl Price