

If. You. Speak.

by Darryl Price

It doesn't matter to me if you speak on behalf of some naked truths or not.
Air can still trip you up to your shaved shins into some nice wet cement and dirty up all that youthful progress in the process. Nothing can save us from dawn. What you can do is accept the latest goop you are given and jump out of the mushy hole you find yourself wading in and go skipping back to new beginnings-- for a brief lark's way, eh? Clean yourself off and continue the next journey inward. What you'll find is there are many different meadows within the meadow. The one at dusk is not the one you met this morning.

That one's gone like a head in the window.

Things have happened since then that have changed things. But the center remains your best home base. The trick is to realize it can still be found inside the different spots like a touchstone or a portal. You're free to enter the dragon's breath, of course, no matter what they tell you in school, but remember you might get out again in a different country, that's all. And on top of that your own swirling bee hive of atoms is constructing you always toward your own utter final disappearance up the ladder of stars-- like a fire on the lips of a lighthouse.

Again this is nothing to get frightened about—it's only the most natural order of things. Just get on the bus and go to the top if you want. It's a big universe.

You'll end up somewhere. In the meantime please listen for the music that is most alive in the world and dance yourself silly if you must. And you must. You really, really must.

Bonus poem:

Rain Dance

Every chance we got we jumped on the ocean's back and sailed to the new world holding on to a tiger's whiskers, like dreamers often do. We fought occasional sea monsters out of an accrued boredom and false bravado, sometimes in the natural form of a giant running wave, sometimes like smoking serpents made out of a million tree leaves stuck together with cloud. Even the sticky sunlight on the churning wind's spinning arms can simply turn into a gaping mouth of burning teeth-- if you are keeping innocence by the score. Once we entered the new found shore's borderline looking like gold thieves in the night we threw all our noblest aspirations at the local fauna like all boys do. This caused a tremendous tidal wave.

Theater

by Darryl Price

There is nothing left to say. Won't it last?
I'm daydreaming again with my green-eyed head snoozing on my tilted toward a godforsaken boredom hand anyway.
I'm one of the last peasants joining the harboring crowd from where I'm standing. I don't remember how I got pushed up on this particular wooden stage. Or, hey, maybe that was me that just got off to the far off rumble of something coming at us. What would you do with the answers if you found them? I would want to feel like I was being let in on something that makes me stumble and fall to my knees, but, like she said, I don't want it to hurt us so much. Haven't we all had enough of that kind of dying darkly vacant love?

That's impossible to know I guess. Is my time almost well done here? Is that the final answer then? You get to say what you can't begin to articulate and then it's too damn late to reconsider all your bravest options—because once you're up there you're just bound to mutter something stupid that gets magnified and exposed.

The one thing you can do is walk away singing like a ghost. And if you've got a little original move on tap you might as well let that rip up the cardboard scenery as you exit the once fresh greener grass, show them who they're dancing with all along. Drop the anger. Don't look back.

