

Like Trial and (Also) like Error

by Darryl Price

We sat all in a muffled little line up, on the concrete lips of tomorrow's sleepy chin, like all the world's good little children should, as the parade limped itself slowly by, slapping itself against the young day's excitement like a damaged flat tire, trying its best to remain inflated in spite of the spread thin sunlight on every other surface around.

Hungry mice were waiting in darkly camouflaged newspapers, like frozen cars with their headlights on fire.
Another poet I know might use this unique opportunity to also point out their nails were glowing like sticks of pink butter. Finally, the flyovers looked like a swarm of thrown, black handled knives, heading perhaps towards a beautiful magician's assistant strapped to a giant spinning dart board-- like a left over party favor. All ribbons and bows. When it was all done, outside was suddenly so very cold again.

2010

Bonus poems:

A Short Snippet of Prehistoric Text
by Darryl Price

Words are only one weapon to be fired upon the stupid enemy's pyramid of ever growing old, growling, groveling greatly gnashing teeth. He can easily turn simple sounds in to many snakes crawling against us.
That's what you must know from the very start. They'll take your private tears and water-board you with them in an instant. Your amazing, dazzling beauty just infuriates them all the more. They have become mostly animal thinkers by now. This means if you turn your back your neck will most certainly be crunched with every ounce of energy they've got. So why are we still here? We simply haven't given up on each other yet, and because we can feel the new birth of music coming up out of even the smallest of spent to the forest floor twigs and branches. And because to breathe is to desire to always dance. And because to smile still means that there's at least some little hope in the farthest away from us limping along set of stars that we may still see something amazing. They want to force you to live and die in their service, but this can only ever be a very bald lie. That's what we've got that they will not discover the source of, because the only way to find the true source of love is to become the true source of love. You can't hate your way into its familiar cottage in the woods. You can't fight your way through its thickening walls to get at its brightly painted doorway.

You can't bribe your way in. Too bad for them, eh?
They'll gouge out your eyes without remorse, do you understand this, but you won't be blinded like them.

They'll cut off your breasts but you won't be less of a woman. They'll do anything you can imagine to us to get us to shut up. You scare the living shit out of them every second you're around. The sad part is they were once just children like us.Stardust. Earth.Water.

Still they preach their hateful crap to all who'll listen.
Billions have become their book burning drones.
Killing for flags and for pretend kings. Killing for false gods in between words branded into books of faked humility.

Killing for the twin gods of money and even more money.
Killing for more dead fish to come flushing down the rivers of glittering chance.For that brand new car smell. Numb sexual favors.Another billion in whatever like hamburgers sold. Again though there's such a lovely little soft and happy tune floating around here somewhere, there it is, coming from somewhere else than all this silly mess we're stewing in or is it simply part of the day's certain odor? Can't you hear it too? What the hell is that sweetness I smell? Will you tell us once more, oh please? What do you ever hear the wind saying in the trees where you're at? Say it out loud for the rest of us to imagine we hear it, too. Please. Tell us the real brave story again and again.We love it when you do that part that way.

Darryl Price 032010

Sometimes I forget how strange the world is. I'm not so worried about following your rules. I'm much more interested in being real. I've never believed in their definitions of beauty. Yet I've already seen many miraculous things on just about every surface. I figure it's some kind of minute mojo being more cosmic patterns upon another wall somewhere. It's all made out of the same stuff.

But even that's not the whole truth. In order to get there we'd have to go everywhere at once. And yet we dance! I don't have to give you this poem any more than you have to read it. The sun will burn out when the sun will burn out. Until then you have to continue to climb out of yourself into the open air so to speak. The story simply unfolds around you a million times a second like a pretty difficult puzzle but is it fun or can it be?
And still we kill each other. That's the really sad part. We don't even know any other way. Oh sure there are many here among us who refuse to fight but they end up dying any way. There's a point to all these words but you're crazy if you think it's up to me to tell you what that means. I'm not that voice but I hear it too. It's coming out of every rock, every drop of rain, every flower, every particle of air, every stitch of clothing, every cell of skin, every bead upon our silly heads. We take it all way too seriously. Nothing's ever going to stop the gate from closing in on us but we could have a picnic among the rising stones and later count as many stars as there are souls of beings.

d.p. 2009

The Power

I made you a flower thing this morning, but then I put it back to the way it was. What I mean is I decided the best way to give it to you was to simply leave it alone. Does it really matter if it was stuck in the ground somewhere or growing out of my head? After all it popped up with your name right on it and I said, "Hey I know her!"

Still it didn't justify any living thing be sacrificed to the goddess of the moment. This is turning out all wrong. Mainly because I can feel the dreaded them taunting me to get real, buddy. What they mean, what they always mean, is to just conform. Be like us or die away from us. Doesn't matter, either way. They'll rewrite history and there's nothing you can do about it. I'm just really glad right now that flowers don't trade in such utter nonsense. They laugh out loud. They dance around in the wind and mirror the sun's moves step for step. And they're kind of really good listeners to boot. They don't judge the speaker of the house.

I can leave them. What they tend to remember is the way you moved once, dancing among them.

Darryl Price

Bonus: lyrics from when I used to write songs in a band--have a go at it--I know you have a guitar somewhere.

I met you on the corner. You said you had to hurry, your glasses full of treetops. I asked them not to worry. But then you held your wrist out, your clock was crying "look out!" and everybody saw us, they took us for a forest, but no one seemed to notice--our voices nearly choked us.

There is a song that belongs to you I thought I heard it just the other day it's a sad song but it sounded true something like I love you but I may not stay that's what they say-ay-ay-ay

There is a dreamer I remember well she had your face and your sweet sad eyes she has a voice like a cigarette but all she knows are the same old lines the same old lies the same old chorus:she said boy don't try to hold me cause I won't be there only I said hey I just can't be found cause I'm still going around and around I'm going around and around

I built this paper plane to fly us to the moon with the so blue world below us we won't come back too soon we won't come back too soon chorus

Darryl Price

