

My Book of Frozen Ponds

by Darryl Price

We broke our hearts rather than sit in your reversible seats with the plain brown paper packages tied on our laps, we did so together. You don't want to hear about that. It gets too close to the actual murder of love. I get

you. But how do you think that makes us feel? We broke our hearts in order to shine your shoes with our purple bruises.

We broke our hearts in order to not forget who got lost and when. We broke our hearts so that you might experience something raw-tasting on your broken tongues before the end of all our bitter dinner battles, even those yet to come.

Everything's a real mess I guess, but maybe, just maybe, it's still beautiful if you're lucky enough to believe the love is working in spite of such monumentally dull haters being in charge in the world's politics. That's what it takes. That and brave dreaming. We broke our hearts like cups of broken ice.

Broke

heads and we fed the poor among you with our deserted dreams.

We broke our hearts and it broke our hearts to do so. We broke our hearts to shoo off the shrill ravens from the top of the bedroom closet door, confess, and be naked in front of the old white guys in white shirts tribunal of fools. We broke our hearts like little nervous flames.

Like the map of a need. Like the latest small children in like with each other that we once genuinely were.

We broke our hearts to smash their sourly played marching machines to pieces, and get them back to keeping the flame in real time. We broke our hearts with a softer smile than yours pretends to be. We put flowers in all their abandoned chimneys. We sang songs in their covered-up kitchens. We drove the drowned cars back out of the weeping ponds. We wept ourselves silly over that one. Broke our hearts like sprinklers, like a line of pine trees going down a sloping hill breaks a cloud gathering in two. We broke our hearts at super-sonic speed. We broke our hearts until it was far easier to accept our failures and have open-air heart attacks than to fake dumb loyalty. You don't want to play with us anymore. But we still see you standing around in the smoking fields. We broke our hearts, shouting at the sun, the moon and the stars. We broke our hearts believing in something, anything. We broke our hearts like so many grains of tiny leaking sand. Like light pouring around straight soft edges, stashed beneath a closed door. Like screaming jet fighters, falling overhead. Like faraway banged shut screened doors, emeshed with laughter. An out of control hologram of an ocean's winding, wandering staircase, in need of a nail. We broke our hearts like a subpoena. Or a hijacked love letter. Or suddenly missing mushrooms from the human refrigerator of decaying time itself.

Broke our hearts again and again 'til you finally started showing up for the work. And now we're the last shards of that lasting peace that was scattered like plastic lids and bent straws across the parking lots of youth, like leftover Easter bunnies, made of indecipherable chunks of wool now, stuck to the paper wheels and shoes of all modern commerce, and held abay.

Bonus poem:

Anything could be typed here and it wouldn't matter because words are only smoke signals right now. Because if words could reach you they would have already been in your life like light or air. What I mean is nothing really needs to be said other than what is being said. So however many words it takes that is the number. Anything less is a lie and we are way past lying to each other. Our lines have been spoken and this makes me glad. It is not a terrible burden. If anything it is a perfect fit. The here I inhabit thanks you for the one you are. This poem has no other meaning. It flowered for you. It will fade with your name on its lips. That is its whole season and for this you cannot be sorry. Hope it's your color or can become it. The anything became the something only because you deserve the living facts of my art, not that I deserve or ask for anything more.

dp

