

People Get Haircuts

by Darryl Price

like they are trying to not get noticed by fickle death. It clearly marks them in a targeted way. Very ironic.
Here's the only message I want you to ever have from me : quick, scramble like a monkey with a stolen banana in your tiny hairy hand--pull yourself up on me now, I will not let you go, I promise. They think that's an impossible scenario-- because one of us just might fall anyway! But I'm not talking about physically. If I was I sure wouldn't be a poet. I don't have arms, I've words. And words can do anything.

People get some haircuts like it makes them better than others without the same look.
Well, it doesn't. This is what I'm against.
Don't join any army of haircuts. Get your hair cut or don't get your hair cut, but don't ask me to follow your direction either way. I'll decide for myself, thank you. People get haircuts like they are just showing you who you are, not showing you who they are. It's a con. One of the world's oldest. Just like marking an item up in price and then discounting it by that much. People always seem to believe in getting a bigger bargain. People get haircuts and the death planes still zoom into the split open skies, their bellies full of Available online at «<http://fictionaut.com/stories/darryl-price/people-get-haircuts>» Copyright © 2019 Darryl Price. All rights reserved.

poisonous black darts. People get haircuts and the poorest children are still locked up in filthy cages by obedient adults who should know better. People get haircuts and the drooling stars drip through the wounded ozone waiting to strike us at the bare ankles. People get haircuts and go to private meetings and drive around in bullet proof vans and eat at fancy restaurants, even if it means waiting for hours to get seated, but they have no attention spans in their hearts for the young boys parking their cars. They take their time.

They get fuller, all the time twisting each other's arms and heads into some kind of guilty submission to the empty throne of money before them. They'll go over the falls. They always do. But you must hang on. You must listen. Brave or scared, children are the only ones now who talk with much honesty to the world. Poets cheer them on from the bleachers of their words. Who are you to put them so far down? People get haircuts and the village bells are ringing out all over the planet's surface like warning shots before the next ghastly world war begins its daily slaughter of all innocents. People get haircuts and our children are being shot in their schools for opening a math book. Books are being quietly murdered to make way for more parking spaces. You know the score. It doesn't really matter. What matters is not to become like them when the time comes to speak up and state your name. It will be alright.

Sooner or later. We don't know how long it will take this time. We are counting on you to just be yourself. Nothing more. And nothing less. People get haircuts because of their own reasons. Keep each other safe.
Keep each other entertained. Keep the faith in all of us, together or apart.

Bonus Poems:

Old Family Recipe
by Darryl Price

Be brave and kind and curious. Be brave and kind and curious. Be brave and kind and curious. Be brave and kind and be curious. Be brave, kind and curious.
Be brave and kind and curious. Be brave, be kind, be curious. Be brave and kind and curious. Be brave and kind and be
curious. Be brave, kind and curious.
Be brave and kind and curious. Always brave and always kind, always curious.

How/Can You Live from a Broken Heart
by Darryl Price

Can you go without a start? How in the world will we recognize each other from just a photo of the back of a head? Can you live from a broken heart? When did you buy what they were selling? Is it true, you were willing to break into a name's sacred vault and cowardly steal its true meaning for a new lover's golden fake amusement? I don't know. I guess so. I mean, right? Here we are. Well, here I am at least. Somehow. But sometimes the pain is still almost unbearable. People tell me to get a dog. I have a dog.

People want me to read a book.
I have read many books. They say only forgiveness will unlock any rusted door. I don't care.

There is nothing to forgive. Can you live from a broken heart? It doesn't matter. Much. To. Me. This poem isn't about that and you know that is true. I'd raise my clenched fist and shout, "Strawberry Fields Forever", but it still wouldn't answer the call for you. Nothing can. What's broken is broken. I wish I had better news for you.

That's why the ship is waiting. That's why birds are flying backwards. No one knows the answer. They only tell themselves what they want to hear.

Bells give the bell ringer his voice.
But they don't make his life longer or shorter. We do all that. Can you live from a broken heart? The drunken town doctor will say it's all useless, and maybe it is, but the young folks will try to still believe for as long as they can in something new and timeless that's beautifully sounding its horn.

Little Moths
by Darryl Price

Many men in history have tried to do just that--burn you out of the paper, pages turning into ash and smoke. It doesn't ease your desire to know those things that make the world so exciting, so amazing to see, to touch.

I know how badly you want to become part of that light. So much that you are willing to damage your wings to make the point. But there are birds and bats who would love such a hot meal in mid-air. Crawl up under my words, don't make a sound, I would say, until you are safe, but I know you deserve your plunge into the unknown, the abyss of your dreams like anyone else.

