

The Rag & Bone Armada Breaks Rank Upon the Barrier Reef like the Torpedo It Really is and Sinks Its Target with a Wink and a...

by Darryl Price

When it's over and done the dangling skeleton walks away in one direction and the rushing wind pours itself into the other. My concern is always to be by your side. Most people probably think even that is giving it way too much of a movie plot, but here's the thing you rub up against: good or bad, once a soul becomes aware it can cause a lot of damage. You can call it a Navajo blanket or a Japanese umbrella but still it has a name that gets pronounced in the fiery blasts of creation just like any other animal face. This is major magic or playful science or photosynthesis, but it's always a grand scale miracle. We live in the stuff. That's why you shouldn't be surprised at all if the walls talk to you or bend your thoughts into many more pretty rooms than mirrors. It's standard. The question remains, are you awake? If you're listening, what are you going to do about it? That's where you came into this space for me. Where poems are planted for future generations.

We're feeding important information through the gaps in time and space with words for tools, with words for land, with words for seed. Some of us belong to that kind of thinking. I said I would look out for you and I will. What you do with that amount of eternal care is not really my concern. It belongs to you. I'm only here to celebrate the fact and move on or be moved on by a river of circumstance.

Then the dancers become another form and shape to contend with. They speak in shadows. They speak in light. You are the ones who must decipher their understanding. Not me.

At any rate, I've become nothing more than pages, curtains, and old maps. Look at it this way, we're saying hello to the magic once again to start the engine and get you going.

Bonus poem:

That Train Went Off

by Darryl Price

towards better, safer times. We were waving oh oh oh goodbye, good luck to all our many ripening selves, silly and spilling around the quick little rectangular windows flashing by like flashbulbs like some kind of beatnik flowers having their head of petals busily brushed flat again by the fussy rough old winds of immediate changing aging time. Whatever you do--don't fall all the way outside! Oh do be careful! Oh I can hope they can make it back to us alive somehow. Tell me how can they possibly miss us so completely and still be wanting for us back home around the dinner table aroma? If we believe in that kind of luck I suppose you can pull the whole world up to your chin quite far enough then to finally see the journey as one belonging to all woods.

I'm guessing that shouldn't be so difficult to understand. It is all about the water, or the light in the water.

Write it on your heart's reflecting pool so you'll remember this;
something's always pouring into something else by mistake or by design.

