

Unseen (a Five-Pointed Star with Four Streaming Lights Coming Out of Its Back Like Mutable Feathers)

by Darryl Price

What you see us doing here is not so much, and all we are not being there isn't either. Our kissing mouths may not always be singing, but we are constantly praying for you, and for more rain or less rain, rivers as the situation warrants. Don't worry.

We don't believe in a god who hates gay people or believes in slavery or thinks of women as cattle. We only play to strum into the ears of the universe a new difference, a peace in our time offering. One that proposes a love supreme act accordingly.

What we are actually doing is dancing with everything. To dance is to mean what you say, to feel what you are, as it connects from body to body throughout time, even bodies of water, even bodies of stars, even bodies of dreamers, dreaming in infinite space, even bodies of texts. We do all this on purpose. You must know this by now. It is done for you, but not only for you.

Because it is in harmony with the ancient trees on the arms and legs of mother earth sending and receiving the wisdom to care. Because it is an act that can be carried out at any time from any place by anyone.

It is not a religion. It is not a joke. It is not anything but people. I like to think of it as poetry, but that's just me.

All That Exists, Perceived By This State of Mind, Is Wounded, Ruined, Killed or Just Absorbed
by Darryl Price

Time's a bent to hell postcard. Its meaning gets creased and folded more each day. You've gotten yours mailed too late. Can't help it if bad weather got in the way. Call it a solar flare. A fizzled failing star.
Your name was written on top of ice.
It melted way too fast on the way down. The one robber wind we couldn't push hard enough against, sent your way, be it by fallen tree or half-eaten moon, heard out in the world's soft places where you alone would notice its falling feathers, I swear, in the sky in the water as it flapped and swirled by like a scrawl of blowing leaves. All for you. I never meant those notes to disintegrate. Thought you'd continue their strange flight straight back to me again and again til closing circles would bring us face to face at last. Until one smile could be pressed neatly onto another.

One hand would light a candle with the heat between palms simply by tipping to the other with real hot intent. By now that smoke and ash have melted into the landscape forever.
If there is new laughter among the pines it stays clearly within its own distance. But there are still unsaid things to come. As you can see. There are these small sad etchings just barely visible on settled stones. Saying what I can't fathom. We have not been found.

What I Want To Put To You

doesn't give up on new seasons. I've tried to keep it in pretty good shape, I'm only one keeper of that next eternal go-around. Oh let them ride their watery horses to death, sharpened on wheels of trophy teeth, tearing the earth of its most beautiful softly lumbering dreams. What they don't know is it doesn't matter if the music solidifies in mid-air. It will play on. This too shall flicker and pass. This cannot stand the clock of doom. It's written across their sun hurt eyes.

In the meantime here we are and here we shall remain for our love is in us. They shall extinguish the sun and still not kill that lighted reign. There's also the story of their own hauntings.
Let's switch topics then and return to see through sad meanings swathed between us.
I realize you have your own weather conditions to consider before thinking about mine. This is simply why I must address you so, to speak your name without giving away your sacrifice. I've already packed my life back into the collar of my coat. It is done without remorse.
This is the closest I may come to ever holding your hand again.
I do so gladly, with overwhelming bliss. That's the catch, if there is one, and if there isn't, we need never mention it. I've already seen you next to me. I know the beauty that stirs awake in your presence. I have felt it awaken all my senses with a single jolt. It isn't much, these words, for they won't feed you, or clothe you, but please know they also don't abandon you.
