A Fib

by David Ackley

We want our lives even-cut, using the same measure as before, as always: inches, minutes, meters.

It falls from the pulse, inclining us to the regular. So many per each you, all one pump, two pump, that's it for you, chump; it comforts mostly

but for the airy skip when Old Reliable books around the corner of what's next with way too many steps like Keaton on the lam from those foolish, button-busting cops armed, this time, with Glocks.
