Against Disorder

by David Ackley

	It is true that the college dogs spread vermin, reeked, shat on the soccer field where it waited, smoking, fetid, dire as only shit can be, for the white shoes of visiting teams splendid in their new uniforms, their preppy haircuts secret weapon, along with our girls, barefoot,	secret weapon, along with our girls, baroroot,	overalled, bobbing after the ball.
	And that the dogs themselves sometimes bunted the ball out of bounds when a score threatened against us, that they'd been known to show teeth to the opposition,
	to piss on their tires;
	that they did it doggy style before the library porch on parents' day, dogged the steps of the president in packs and howled outside his door at night so he heard bears and wolves and students howling like dogs.
	Still, why have rules on them as if they were lesser? Exemplars among us, so fine without laws.

Available online at «http://fictionaut.com/stories/david-ackley/against-disorder» Copyright © 2014 David Ackley. All rights reserved.

2

~