Window

by David Ackley

Seen from the window, a young deer holds at the edge of the field we clear.

I tally the flicked ear, and tucked scut, how the hide shudders like a sail catching air.

We seem held together by the glass, immersed in our separate fears while my dying father, whom I will not wake to see, sleeps beside me in his chair.