When the wind/sky really is God

by Ed Higgins

and all the trees are holding their limbs up in prayer and rain is mating with soil and loam itself is sperm life for the oak, or maple or any other tree and you stand there admiring the green, or red, or orange or brown leaves depending on the season's fecundity or maybe just enjoying the stark naked tree in winter and the whole thing is a gift to the wind/sky God or to whatever is beyond the sky where solar winds that are now swirling streams out into the infinite universe which is hope or at least something like it looping back toward us at the speed of prayer where it helps keep pace with dreams
