

Dark-Thirty

by Gary Hardaway

The city's dome of artificial light ghosts a crosshatch of contrails under the dimmed stars. The throb of a Dodge Ram Hemi with after market pipes dopplers past. No need to see- the sound declares the facts.

The smell of garlic, soy, and onions exhausted from Skillman Wok perfumes December air. You shudder with the chill and crush the filtered Marlboro Black against the bottom of the brown, bakelite ashtray and retreat to gas-fired warmth inside a sagging, taxed and mortgaged, wood-framed, suburban house.

