

Imagining the Reading as Effacement

by Gary Hardaway

The ear and eye combine to give the tongue and larynx their sound in the small room with many empty chairs.

What the spaces say

can be heard in the short and longer silences and throaty inspirations that voice the soft vowels and brushed or chiseled consonants.

There ought to be a screen to show the scatter patterns light and dark

 on the wall

with the voice and face at the back of the room heard only as the words burn themselves or not across assembled retinas

with the mouth itself a heard but unseen servant offstage.
