

Pocket Poems Scratched on Paper Scraps at Work

by Gary Hardaway

Abundant Trees Disquiet Them

Where we're from there are no trees.
Just lichens, low shrubs,
and safely stable brick and stone.
The wind at home moves nothing but dry snow and scraps of paper.
Too many sparrows flit and twitter here.
Let's go inside. The sky is far too big and the sun bears down on us like searchlights.
We'll brew some tea and stir in cream and sugar and talk among ourselves

Fragrance

Fine perfume is nice.
It smells of superego and polite desire.

June

It's early birdie-eat-cricket month when local favorites, crickets and grackles, vie for parking lot supremacy- the crickets, via overwhelming numbers, and the grackles, via hunger and the art of snatch and swallow.

Of King and Castle

The tangible world oppresses so he plays with his phone, double thumbing through his 4 G kingdom where whatever displeases
can be deleted, unfriended, or reported as spam.
He makes and takes no calls.
