

September 26, 2016

by Gary Hardaway

In honor of Eliot's 128th birthday, I should like to speak eloquently of time, what might have been, history, the cycling of the old into the new,

the place of one in time's cavalcade, the place of faith in the placement of one in times array, the faith that all shall be well.

I am not up to even one Quartet, let alone a Quartet of quartets.

I lack the intellect, discipline, and faith in anything but our ultimate erasure.

Instead of eloquence and coherence, let me offer this:

whatever weaknesses you displayed as empathetic human fellow traveler, your command of English survives you, on into the last echoes of the human once we're gone.

