

Speck in the Thrall of Cosmic Forces

by Gary Hardaway

There is plenty to fear: tornadoes as the air warms and Gulf moisture covers the flatlands of Kansas and Oklahoma; the icy scream of a polar vortex;
the newly licensed driver, texting as he drives to school; the drunk driving without license, insurance, or apparent care; the erasure of modest mutual funds in a chain of bursting investment bubbles; the swell of magma beneath the fabulous beauty of Yellowstone Park; the swarm of small bodies orbiting the sun that bump and speed one or the other of their number in a death fall to earth orbit and the oceans and fractured tectonic plates of earth itself.

Fear the air and fear the fire.
Fear the land and fear the water.
Creation is out to get you, speck, for you are nothing and the dark will swallow you whole and never notice.
