

Testament Part 3 of 6

by Gary Hardaway

Our ships once teemed along the shore like pups at their mother's teats.
After the swelling of the Sea, the dead outnumbered the living and the shipwrights died where they lived, along the Sea.
We had looked at water and the things afloat and learned the happiest shapes and properties of hulls. Our ships swam shallow in the Sea, which made them quick. Our rudders thrust themselves into the Sea, deep enough to make us nimble but not so deep as to catch the weeds that flourish under dazzled water.
After the swelling of the Sea, our ships lay broken, far inland, ribs exposed like those of whales ashore, rotting in the sun.

The bodies of the dead lay broken, too, and bloated. Who survived could not know them.
We piled the pieces of ships and pieces of men and burned them. Smoke arose to dim the sun.

Perhaps the Earth, Sea, and Sky were done with us and chose to tatter all we were and leave it to the Mycenaean swords and fires to obliterate. What we were lies ruined and mysterious-- evocation to the unkind imagination of the Brute-- alive now only in the children of concubines and rape.

Against that, this testament, scratched

Available online at «<http://fictionaut.com/stories/gary-hardaway/testament-part-3-of-6--2>»

Copyright © 2013 Gary Hardaway. All rights reserved.

with misshapen styluses, made from memory by unskilled hands, with a pallid memory of ink.

