The Brevity of Anthropology

by Gary Hardaway

In time's embroidery, the human story is a short stretch of a short strand within the thread of half a knotand that stretch of strand's defective.

What will mourn us when we're gone? Not the plants which live so lightly on the earth. Not the scorpions and not the ants. Perhaps the roaches and rats will miss us as they hunger for extraordinary waste our kind once left behind.