

When the Muse Abandons You

by Gary Hardaway

My muse has unfriended me.
No more vague instant messages.
No more enigmatic emails.
No more ethereal prompts posted to my home page.

I am abandoned to the mundane calculations of a small mind trapped by small considerations such as what to buy for dinners this week, what

paper goods to replenish, what staples, like rice and onions, to re-supply. It's not so much sad to be alone as boring and banal.
No second, third or fourth opinions rearrange and ruffle the shopping list.

It's only you and the cats shaping the small commerce of a small household. And the cats have very limited concerns such as is there kibble to nibble?

Will we have our canned pate'?
Will there be fresh litter to clump and freshen our excrement? And, where is the nip? You promised us nip.

