

April

by Ginnah Howard

The shock of forsythia, quince...your thighs when you lean in for the milk. Well, hello hunger: what a sweet surprise.

If one could count on anything beyond now, I count on the trout lily's return, but come March--the barren hills sleet-gray--that your thighs are going to wake a warm beast anywhere on my terrain isn't even on my list:

Be thankful:
four cords of wood left,
plus all that untethered range.

Then heat, thunder, spring-night air, and the hollow just below your hip, surfaces. Here we are again: you, washing your hands at the sink; me, peeling potatoes. Each time you pass through my zone, I want to rub my chest against you and purr.

But wouldn't you know it, we've been grumpy so long, just when I'm watching your fingers peel back the plastic on the Cheerios, you're soliloquizing CD rollovers. You've refurbished an old hide-out and it's going to take a lot of good dinners and going-alongs.

Only a few nights ago the peepers woke--a more discordant opera of hankering you've never heard: such a din of longing, each me, me, me tuning up. Imagine the transcription. What librettist ever got Babel better: the gospel of love?
