I Don't Know How the Nights Can Be So Long When Life Is So Short

by Jerry Ratch

I will always remember that picture of you in your bright blue summer dress, with your arms spread out against a wooden fence in Central Park.

Your thin body leaning back, and long dark hair over bare arms, like tattoos.

I remember how you took my heart in your red mouth like that hawk on the Met Museum skylight and ate it entirely, soul and all, before the astonished faces of a whole class of school children.

You will never know how much it hurt when someone else touched your face.

But I know how much you counted on others

to pull the slivers
out of your heart,
and that you were better at shaving your legs
than you were at spreading your wings.
