

Ode To Poetry Slams

by Jerry Ratch

It is a dark and stormy night, naturally We're trying to get some sleep at a Travelodge in Eureka when I get up at 3 a.m. to write
"Hard motel pillow receives snoring from neighboring room"

O Thesaurus, we need another word Maybe it should be: captures, or transmits
How about acquires?
Wait, I've got it — channels!
That's it — channels!
Hard motel pillow channels snoring from neighboring room!

I almost said my hard motel pillow channels snoring from neighboring county

Another county yet?
It's possible, if the county line runs directly down the wall between our rooms but let's at least try to use some logic here

Okay, we're really somewhere in France during the 1920's and registered as Andre Breton or other maybe with a wiry moustache and we're used to drinking a lot and our pals are getting high and there's drugs and absinthe

And suddenly a fellow named Monsieur Logic flies spread-eagle out a tall window while a bicyclist is passing by underneath and suddenly a wailing baby named Monsieur Surreal is born on a lane not dark with trees

And it's not dark and stormy anymore
It is bright with a surprising reality or super reality. It's way too bright to see ordinary reality, and anyway I've completely forgotten what we were here for — ah yes, to sleep, to sleep, perchance to dream
