

Smack

by Jerry Ratch

They shoot up through the soles of their feet once the veins in their arms are all used up.

They shoot up in their necks like cows on the African Savannah whose blood from a slit in the neck vein is used to feed whole tribes, mixed with the milk from the same cow.
It's supposed to taste more or less like a strawberry shake.
And they are feeding the frenzy of the poppy inside the ice of life.

They shoot up, and they shoot up and shoot up as the camera in God's eye watches and sighs.
