

Hospital, or Depression III

by John Riley

Yes sir, I confess there have been times when I did not care how young the earth is or take pride in how she sprang back to green regardless of how hard the snow fought.
There have been times, yes, when I lacked the will to notice such things and knew that below the water's surface there is only more surface.
Today I had contempt for how the fish hurried away to the far bank as I approached and thought him silly to run away when I only wanted to admire his wide innocent eyes.
I resolved to tell others that fish will make them more alone but met no one to listen and my thoughts burned away.
When I think of the fish now all I feel is envy at how he darted away with an invisible flip of his tail, and that his pond is the smallest of the three we may visit when the weather permits.
