

Weed Fire

by John Riley

Wind was a sorry excuse for force by time the fox stopped running, ending his escape of the failing fire, and waited, hunched but never slinking, inside the weeds and we, the three of us, on the edge of the field, you and your brother who would brag later he had tossed the match, did not wait like the fox, as though our existence had been threatened, but with the shallow, yellow transience of new humans disappointed (although I, the only one who was afraid of the joy of destruction that could have been set free, was the most disappointed) that our smoldering would soon be gone.
