1958-1961

by Julie Leung

In those years,
you and I were told to leap
for a world suffused with sound and industry.

They taught you to kneel, heavy and ox-like, in the rice fields.

You drowned your books in the mud and I forgot the old ways of writing.

You and I were told to leap for a leaden world, silenced.

And when you fell under its weight, they dragged you through the public square. I pried the slivers of glass out of your knees and removed the placard from around your neck.
