

Minus Mammalian Skin

by Katie Moore

This is learning to live without skin, each nerve ending exposed, flayed. I'm meat. handled with bitter lack of understanding, sometimes my nerves scream.

It's soundless, but they're saying please, don't let it hurt, don't let us be consumed by the air, don't let it be madness.
My muscles tense
in bare rhythm.

I am small and skinless like the chihuahua grabbed by the fur between my two strong sets of pit bull jaws and shook like a squeak toy.
Somehow it lives that way, yapping its displeasure and trotting on its short legs.

Without a skin, person or dog is left vulnerable to pricks and pinches. Even soft touch hurts. Me and the chihuahua aren't waterproof, protected from sick squirming germs, or good at keeping warm. We're cold blooded creatures now.
