

A Question of Choice

by Kim Conklin

The contrast can be summed up in a sip.

Long burnt and bitter, country coffee never changes. It's consumed with tense smiles and ritual conversations, customs of conformity, isolation and stagnation.

Urban coffee, consumed in conversation and not, flavored and not, sweet or strong or both, is vibrant, tasting richly of ideas, growth and hope.

