Sewing the Labyrinth

by Kirsty Logan

She will sit and she will stitch.

Penelope sewed for love; those unnamed girls — sister of swans, spinner of straw to gold — sewed for their lives. Sold into tangles made by mothers, the endless edge of the coin between women. If girls have keys for fingers then locks cannot hold them. Now Ariadne has her thread, golden as porridge, and she too must sew. For love, for life, to be another man's wife, she forces fistfuls of gold into keyholes. The desertion of man makes a hero, but mothers must build their homes from birth-red dirt and branches sap-bled. A thousand pomegranate seeds will make a fireplace. A bull made of gowns, a beast stitched from slippers: this is the task that will make a woman a myth.

Now she will sit and she will stitch because that is what girls must do.
